The Children's Museum Isn't Just Playing Around

Since its founding in 1913, the Museum's educational programs and exhibits have expanded in scope to include the study of cultures, the man-made world, and the process by which people grow and learn. Over the years, the Children's Museum has become a national model of innovative education with a strong commitment to the New England area.

In the early 1960's, the Museum expanded its activities to include community based programs, curriculum development, educational research, and training programs for teachers and community workers. Experiments on new ways to use exhibits to present information and concepts to children and adults were eagerly accepted by visitors and professionals.

Traditional glass cases were replaced with interactive exhibits in which visitors directly participate: making their own movies, celebrating a Japanese Festival, or using a computer terminal -- just to name a few.

In short, the Children's Museum is committed to helping everyone -- especially children -- learn from an increasingly tough and demanding world through direct experiences with real materials. We believe in learning by doing.

- We are a place to learn, through direct participation in provocative exhibits and programs.
- We are a source of workable educational materials and ideas for use in classrooms, neighborhood centers and homes.
- We are a training and consultative service for teachers, museum professionals, group leaders, parents and others committed to the education of children.
- We are a national research and development center, experimenting with non-traditional forms of education and a more dynamic role for museums.

In July, 1979, the Museum opened its new home on Boston's exciting waterfront. Our presence in the city has given us the opportunity to reach more individuals than ever before, both at the Museum and in the classrooms and community centers throughout the region.

Our Corporate Membership Program allows your employees to take full advantage of our many resources and helps the Museum in underwriting the costs of services to these children, teachers, community workers and parents. Furthermore, a Corporate Membership in the Children's Museum may be used in your business as an employee incentive program, as an employee benefit, or as a gift to clients and visiting dignitaries.

We invite you to become a Corporate Member in the Children's Museum.
